

FCC,

I have enjoyed my peaceful dinners, my quiet evenings, my leisurely weekends. I like my voicemail messages from people I talk to regularly. I love the no call list the way it is. If I cancel my account with my bank, or phone company or ISP, I do not want their every hour on the hour phone call haranguing me to rejoin their service. If I broke up with my boyfriend - I would not let him call me every hour on the hour demanding I get back together with him. I would file harrassment charges with my local police. The no call list has kept my calls and voicemail stress free. Before - there would be 20 or 30 automated messages saying that they have a fabulous deal for me - I would have to DIG through the spam to get my legitimate messages, or the phone would ring and it would be a computer asking me to please wait for an important call...if you hang up it calls back, and calls back, and calls back... The list has been made this way for a reason. I like it the way it is. Leave it alone. Do not subject us to the heavy handed tactics, the undaunted haranguing. You'll make us give up the phone line altogether, just to get some peace.
